

HONORING THE PATRIOT DEAD

ner, presented a sharp contrast to the two which preceded it. Its numbers were small, only twelve files, its marching was poor, and the distances were well preserved. The 12th Regiment, Colonial Ward, was well preserved and marched steadily.

The 13th Regiment, General Ullmar, was headed by the 71st Regiment, Colonel Davis, looking neat and soldierly, as usual. The 11th Regiment, Colonel Unthank, was hardly up to the mark in marching. Its deficiency in this respect was more than compensated for the 9th Regiment, which, with its full ranks, steady marching and full band of music, fairly divided the honors of the day with the 7th and 22d Regiments. The rear was brought up by the 3d Regiment Cavalry, local Budke.

The Red, White and Blue Division was much admired. It was composed of the Troy Citizens' Corps, Captain Mack; the three companies of the Old Guard of this city, Captain Smith; the 1st and 2d Companies of the 1st Regiment, and the State Fencibles of Philadelphia, four companies, commanded by Major John W. Ryan. The division was commanded by Major George McLean, commandant of the Old Guard. The Troy Troops wore red coats, white trousers and white helmets. The Old Guard wore white coats and white trousers, and the Fencibles blue coats, white trousers and blue hats.

REVIEWING THE GRAND ARMY.

Then followed the Fests of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Veteran Associations and other bodies. This
